OFICINESTRA
Critical and self-critical examination of people-environment relations-dependencies (perceptions of our habits, attitudes, decisions and behaviors in the forms of production, consumption and disposal that contribute to the weakening of human sustainability); innovation, efficiency, simplicity, cooperation, ethics and human values, foundations for the reconfiguration of possibly sustainable societies; Environmental education practices have been centered on the elements of environmental management (waste, selective collection, recycling, water and electricity saving, renewable sources, waste, vegetable gardens, greenhouse effect, climate change and others) and other reluctant themes. Despite their importance, the current critical socio-environmental situation requires practices that examine more deeply the reasons for the current scenarios and signal alternatives for meeting the challenges, including escaping the profound misperception in which humanity is immersed.
